The study at the Tata Memorial Hospital, involving an 11-year-old boy, was published in the Feb. 1, 2003 issue of the Journal of Clinical Oncology. The boy, said Dr. Rajendra Chaudhry, the lead author, has a tumor in the head of the pancreas that was growing so aggressively that it was compressing his stomach and causing life-threatening heart and breathing problems. All attempts at surgery to remove the tumor had failed. Leading doctors at the Indian hospital called his case the worst that they have seen. He was referred to the hospital and his family in 2004 after he had suffered a near-fatal accident in which he was cut in half by a falling tree branch. With few other options, his doctors were trying to determine whether a combination of drugs, including gemcitabine, a nucleoside analog, and oxaliplatin, an anticancer agent, could shrink the tumor. But the drugs, gemcitabine and oxaliplatin, only temporarily reduce the tumor in some patients and damage other parts of the body, Dr. Chaudhry said. Instead of just trying one of these drugs, the doctors tried the two together and with surgery to remove the tumor, which 6d1f23a050
