Photographers Photo editing requires adjustment of color balance, sharpening, cropping, filtering and transforming images. The adjustments you make to the image can also affect other parts of the photo and even other photos. To edit an image, open it by double-clicking its icon on your computer's desktop. In the case of photos from your phone, camera, or online, open the image from the phone's photo viewer. In the file browser, open the file and select it, then open it. Here's how to edit an image in Elements: Double-click the image to open it. Click the File button at the top left. Select Images | Adjustments | Adjustment Layer. Add Adjustment Layers Add an Adjustment Layer by clicking on its icon, the pencil tool, in the Layers panel on the left. Alternatively, you can Ctrl+click or right-click on the image. Drag the new layer from the Layers panel to the Layers panel, to add it to the image. Click on the new layer to select it and move or resize it. You can also add an Adjustment Layer by typing an adjustment name in the New Adjustment Layer dialog box that appears. Layers panel Add a mask Select the Adjustment Layer, select the Add Layer Mask icon at the bottom of the layer by clicking on it. Click on the layer mask (the black square surrounding the layer icon) to mask off or add to the mask of the layer. You can select a mask by Ctrl+clicking or right-clicking on the mask or by clicking on it. In the Layers panel, drag the layer mask to the mask icon in the Layers panel or click it to open the Layer Mask dialog box. Adjust the layer mask by clicking on it and moving or resizing it. Systematic evaluation and application of a Raman spectroscopic technique for the identification of cervical lesions. In the effort to improve detection of cervical lesions, this study systematically evaluated a newly developed Raman spectroscopic technique, optimized according to a stepwise approach. Two hundred and twenty-two cervical samples were collected from patients with cervical lesions ($n = 112$) or asymptomatic HPV-infected women ($n = 110$). The Raman spectra were acquired using a laser beam from a monochromatic instrument. Principal component analysis (PCA) was used for data preprocessing and for dimension reduction. The histological diagnosis was confirmed by histological analysis of the same biopsies that were analysed in this study. Sensitivity, specificity, positive predictive value and negative predictive value were calculated for various combinations of PCA components. The optimum combination of principal components (PCs) was determined using the jackknife-cross validation method (explained variance, $R(2)$ value, k-means clustering). For HPV-infected women, the jackknife-cross validation method indicated $R(2)$ (determined using cluster analysis) values of $PC1 = 0.83$ (for $PC2 = 0.71$) and $PC2 = 0.89$ (for $PC1 = 0.85$) as the optimal combinations to separate infected from noninfected women. For pre-invasive lesions, $PC1$ only was optimal to separate low grade squamous intraepithelial lesions (SIL) from the normal endocervical epithelium. In this study, a newly developed laser-Raman spectroscopic technique appears to be suitable for the identification of cervical lesions, especially for HPV-infected women.

Mid-Arterial Restenosis: A Clinical Perspective. Acute myocardial infarction due to thrombolysis for ST-elevation myocardial infarction (STEMI) and mechanical reperfusion for acute coronary syndrome have reduced the mortality from myocardial infarction. More than two decades later, the same scenario can still be observed as a large number of patients who have received thrombolytic therapy or percutaneous coronary intervention (PCI) with stenting have experienced restenosis. Since then, restenosis has been recognized as a significant clinical issue. Subsequently, guidelines for the management of non-acute coronary events have addressed the issue of in-stent restenosis (ISR)
