TORONTO -- Canadian law enforcement is attempting to track down an apparent hacker who has been blocking access to secure government websites and says he has millions of people's personal information. Screenshots of the hacking attempts on the website of the country's immigration minister have appeared online and appear to show a wide range of information about people who visited the site. Immigration, Refugees and Citizenship Minister Ahmed Hussen says the government was alerted to the cyberattack that began at 8 a.m. ET on Thursday. He says the hackers were able to get inside some secure government systems and accessed sensitive information. Hussen says the government is working with police, the RCMP and the Computer Emergency Response Team to identify who is behind the hacks. "It's absolutely unacceptable, especially when it's around the protected information of Canadians," he said. "It's a completely unacceptable act, and we're looking for the criminals. We want them to be identified." He says he was told the hack affected only a small number of people and no information about the investigation has been leaked. He says his team is analysing the data and will release the information when it is available. Hussen says the cyberattack should be seen in the larger context of a much broader problem facing the government and the country. "Our large organizations like immigration or health care or government are not prepared for the technology that's here today," he said. "As a result, people are getting hacked. People are sharing their information. People are not going through the proper channels to access services." Speaking to The Canadian Press on Friday, Hussen said the government is taking steps to make sure the breach doesn't happen again. "We have done some work to make sure that information that was shared cannot be exploited." Hussen said the issue

We are using static files in our CMS, and have been for months now. A new round of static files is just being released and as far as I know, is the same as the previous version except for the fact that they weren't static files before. Since a large portion of our site is static, I was wondering if there was any disadvantage to doing this? A: The obvious one, is that an image load is slower than a text load, but I don't think that's really an issue for static content.

If your image you need is 'small' you could cache it anyway (even if it's just on your webserver) Another one, is that you have more files on your server, and more data has to be stored. A: Definitely for images, especially for large images: Small images slow down your site, as they have to be loaded and displayed in every single page on the site. For a large site, it's very annoying (as we've recently learnt on our other site). Big images are extremely inefficient, in terms of bandwidth usage. What happens if you have to rename your images and you have to change the relative path of every single link to the image? EDIT : Another one: your site may be viewed from different browsers (Internet Explorer, Firefox, Chrome, Safari and others). The CSS rules may be different, hence the image width and height values. This can be fixed by also storing a version of the image with the correct width and height, but you still end up with different image in each browser. Also, the HTML code may be different, hence you'll have to different image code, which probably will result in a different image. Isoliquiritigenin induces autophagy and Apaf-1/procaspase-9/caspase-3 activation to ameliorate vascular endothelial growth factor-induced proliferation in human umbilical vein endothelial cells. Vascular endothelial growth factor (VEGF) is a critical angiogenic factor implicated in the pathogenesis of proliferative diabetic retinopathy (PDR). Isoliquiritigenin (ILG) is the most active component of Glycyrrhiza echinata, a traditional Chinese herb. To elucidate the protective effect of ILG in human umbilical vein endothelial cells (HUVECs) exposed to VEGF, the HUVECs were treated with ILG, VEGF, or both. ILG significantly attenuated the VEGF-induced phosphorylation of Akt (Ser473), thereby leading to inhibition of HUVEC survival. ILG was observed to induce autophagy by increased conversion of LC3-I to LC3-II, increased Atg5 protein expression, and increased formation of the autophagosome after treatment with ILG, indicating that ILG induces autophagy. The autophagy inhibitor 3-methyladenine significantly restored VEGF-induced Akt phosphorylation and cell viability. In addition, ILG inhibited VEGF
