Camtasia Studio 8 (HKLM-x32.Mammillary Bodies Mammillary bodies (MBs) are small, round, and highly vascularized nuclei of neurons located in the medial part of the basal forebrain. The MBs receive their main projection from the hypothalamic tract (posterior hypothalamic region) and are thought to be involved in processing behavioral, sensory, affective, and motivational information (Rosen, 2011). There is still some debate about whether they have subregions. The central region is most important in terms of their neurochemistry (Jones, 2000), and the posterior, sensory portion is most important in their role in processing sensory stimuli (Whiting and Chiba, 1990). Anatomy The MBs are located in the parenchyma of the lateral septal nucleus and, on each side, in the diagonal band of Broca and stria terminalis (Putz-Suter, 1989). They are 3 to 5 mm in diameter and can be distinguished by a small avascular central core and a densely packed shell made up of neuronal cell bodies and their dendritic processes (Kornhuber and De Vries, 1990). Neurochemical Characteristics The MBs have been found to have massive levels of the biogenic amines, norepinephrine (NE), dopamine (DA
