What may be the most famous – though no doubt most absurd – example of this new-old phenomenon is the French movie Les Misérables, which doesn't have a single scene set before the French Revolution or any women in its costumes on display. The Disney-Pixar film is the fourth-highest-grossing movie of all time worldwide, but more than just producing a large amount of wealth, the movie arguably changed the scope and landscape of the movie industry. Since that, Disney has been on a roll, earning more than $7 billion in its fiscal year that just ended in June, and two of its most anticipated sequels are already in the works.
