The effects of low dose fetuin on ex vivo fertilization, development of early human embryos, and the formation of syncytial trophoblast and ectoplacental cones. The effect of exogenous low dose fetuin on in vitro fertilization, and the subsequent culture of fertilized eggs in human albumin, was assessed. Low dose fetuin had no significant effect on in vitro fertilization, although there was a trend for higher fertilization in the presence of fetuin. Following in vitro culture, cleavage and pregnancy rates were higher in the presence of low dose fetuin. Cloning rates were higher in embryos cultured in the presence of fetuin, but at this stage no increase in pregnancy rates was observed. However, when embryos were cultured longer in a chemically defined medium, where only the zona pellucida was removed, increasing numbers of pregnancy rates were observed at later stages. The removal of the zona pellucida alone did not increase the pregnancy rates. A similar result was seen when the embryos were cultured in human albumin following fertilization. In addition, it was found that after longer culture in human albumin, syncytial trophoblast (ST) formation was increased. Also, as determined by RT-PCR, fetuin had a greater effect on the regulation of ST marker genes (HLA, PROM-1 and BPAG2) as compared to albumin, suggesting differences in the potential for successful implantation.
