Erythropoiesis in zinc deficiency--relation between zinc status and packed erythroid cell production. The effect of zinc deficiency on erythropoiesis was investigated in male mice fed diets containing either less than or more than the requirement for zinc or a diet adequate in zinc and the addition of small amounts of zinc. Using two different erythropoietin assays, erythropoiesis was found to be depressed at lower dietary zinc levels. In both assays red cell production was 3--4 times higher in 4- to 6-week-old mice fed a zinc-deficient diet than in age-matched animals fed the adequate zinc diet, even though the body zinc contents were reduced only by 13--17%. The red cell production in zinc-deficient mice was not significantly increased by vitamin B12 administration, whereas in erythropoietin-treated mice an elevation of this property resulted in enhanced erythropoiesis even in zinc-deficient animals. Liver metallothionein concentrations and a remarkably high uptake of inorganic [<sup>59</sup>Zn] and organic [sodium <sup>65</sup>Zn] iron were found in the animals fed the zinc-deficient diet. After 40 days of zinc deficiency iron concentrations in red cells were the same in the 4- to 5-week-old animals as in controls. The iron accumulating in the liver in these animals did not appear to be a critical limiting factor to the erythropoietic action of zinc in the mouse. In animals fed more than twice the requirement for zinc, red cell production was depressed. In these animals a graded depression of metallothionein concentration in the liver and of zinc concentration in bone was observed in concert with a reduction of erythropoiesis, which the addition of zinc to the diet partly prevented. In spite of a 1.5 times higher requirement for zinc in 4- to 5-week-old mice than in 6- to 8-week-old animals, the level of packed erythroid cell production in the four age groups, all fed
