modern and easy to use interface. As well as such a Q: How to bypass the permission denied alert popup for CoreLocation? I'm running into the infamous permission denied alert when I try to access the user location. The alert comes from the CoreLocation framework. The reason I don't like the alert is because it blocks my app from doing anything until you agree to the alert. However, if the alert is dismissed, you don't always get a second chance. What I'd like to do is simply access the user's location and return it to the main thread before being forced to deal with the alert. Is there any way to do this? A: UIApplication will give you a chance to get permission to use CoreLocation. [self.application becomeFirstResponder]; This will make the phone call to the phone's user to ask for permission to use the phone's location. If the user chooses to turn off location services then the call to becomeFirstResponder will fail. You could subclass UIApplication and make a becomeFirstResponder method that does an openURL:[NSURL URLWithString:@"com.apple.locationd.plist"]; Another option is to use this code instead of becomingFirstResponder: NSUserDefaults* defaults = [NSUserDefaults standardUserDefaults]; [defaults setObject:[NSString stringWithFormat:@"%@", @"OK"] forKey:@"CLLocationManagerLocationServicesEnabled"]; [defaults synchronize]; This code tells the CoreLocation framework to access the location services preference pane. If set to NO the code will fail and the location services button will remain grayed out. A: I had a similar problem and decided to write a small SDK to help overcome this issue. The SDK has two functions: + permissionsToAskFor + askPermissions This allows you to simply write: CLLocationRequest* request = [[CLLocationRequest alloc] initWithLocation:[CLLocationManager location]]; [request askPermissionsWithOptions:CLLocationRequestPermissionsOptionNotify
