Players will instantly feel more skilled during match when the ball is in motion thanks to real-time camera control of player movements. It also helps gauge in-game probabilities, when players will receive passes, or if a defender is able to intercept the ball. The brain is being challenged and invigorated by these new challenges. In the world of today the understanding of the brain is evolving exponentially and we think we can use football to teach and train people on how to do these things to help boost their performance. The brain will adapt to these new visual cues to become more 'visual'. We're getting there. [5:59] Motions on the pitch are mapped to real actions off it The data received from the motion capture suits is used to determine which player will receive which pass, or which player intercepts the ball. The base of data collection in FIFA is understanding what movements are required for a player to create that action and then coding that by reading the player's body movements in real-time. We have the ability to read the player's body movements and make
