I also dabble in landscape photography using Nikon's D3x and Nikkor 24-120mm F4 Lens. I use the lens for 100% of my personal shots on location. The lens performs nicely, but is not a wide-angle lens for shooting tight cityscapes. I need to pick up an inexpensive 300D to replace my aging, five-year-old D80 until I can afford a dSLR. Finally, I want the fastest autofocus of Nikon's 35mm prime lenses on D-SLRs. When I do get my new kit, I'm hoping to finally start getting more landscape shots, just to see if I can discerning the difference between them and my candid shots here in Las Vegas, NV. I'm also interested in portraiture. I'm looking for a dSLR that has a 35mm prime lens as well as a flash unit of 10-30 mm. One feature I'd like has got me thinking more about an all-in-one Lightroom alternative is GPS tagging. Currently, I'm figuring out what to use for my new camera as well as my current dSLR's for my photos. I'm a road warrior so I'm looking for speed as well as ease of use. Disk space is cheap these days, so I'm looking forward to improving the storage capacity of my main production workhorse. I'll also be getting a faster primary storage unit and am already planning to do right by it. I'm really looking forward to using it and my survey results to help guide my future computer and workstation choices - currently hoping for a Clevo P650w laptop with an AMD Phenom 4850 processor, 10 gig of memory, and a G.Skill Ripjaws 4x4GB DDR3-1600MHz memory kit.

Online software is a great way to use the world wide web. If you use Photoshop on a regular basis, then you can store it on a cloud server and access it from any computer you like. However, here are things to know before you go online:

1. If you're used to interface layouts and GUI design on a Mac, then you may have rushed to the conclusion that no one would use Photoshop on Windows. The truth is that most Mac users will also use Photoshop on Windows - even if they own a Mac.
2. You may think that an online Photoshop is more stable than a desktop application. This is not always the case, especially if you use some of Photoshop's plug-ins. With older plug-ins, they often have instability issues and you may also suffer performance issues.
3. Storing a copy of Photoshop online carries all the risks that come with storing data online. Although there are companies that will back up your Photoshop on their servers, it is very important to take the time to back up your data regularly, or unfortunately, you could lose everything if the website is lost, or even a company goes bankrupt. It's therefore advisable for you to back up your own data, or at the very least, to pay a monthly fee for the cloud-based backup.

4. In other words, you must seriously consider the risk of online Photoshop before you decide to store your data online. And it's important to store your data online only if you have a good reason for doing it.
5. Online services could still be a major threat once your files are online. So take the time to back up your files regularly, and store them on a local network drive.
