Adobe's new -- or franchised, as some would say -- Creative Cloud apps are well-executed, although they lack the finesse and flexibility of Apple's workflow and desktop products. The idea here is similar to Apple's "One-App-at-a-Time" philosophy, where you get to focus on just one task at a time, freeing yourself to edit images, create slideshows out of them or add video that way. It's a very efficient way to work. Ah, designers. As Ilja von Arnim says, it's hard not to root for you. When you think about the average life of a billboard design, it's destined to be short-lived. If you create a few blog posts, some images or a brochure, you'll need to change it afterward. Most designers and developers have to create several variations of various designs to meet the intricacies of the product's requirements. The average end result is usually not very good. A modern version of Photoshop is the perfect workflow solution to that issue. Adobe is committed to getting the right results in dark, poorly lit areas, and has long been recognized as blazing the trail for applications that support creative workflows. 30 megapixel and native raw (and even raw+ JPEG) support are big deals for me as an exclusive Fujifilm market. I'm not alone in that regard. Apple has been working on the same thing for some time now. It would be nice if Adobe would improve the file output quality. It's a bit of a nitpick, though, since the raw editing features in Lightroom are similarly limited. That said, Lightroom has a manual mode, so you can see the underlying algorithm forest and pick out the trees for manual tweaking and correction.
