The present invention relates generally to the field of mail collection and more particularly to the field of mail box thread processing machines. Oftentimes, mail collection machines, such as mail collection machines of the United States Postal Service or other mail collection machines, are able to only receive mail in a single orientation. Thus, if a mail collection machine receives mail in an incorrect orientation, the mail must be manually or mechanically flipped, which can be a laborious and time consuming task, while the mail is re-processed by the mail collection machine. The bulk mail process is a method of reliably delivering mail to households within a certain volume of geographic region. Typically, mail is combined into bundles and dropped from airplanes at a set height, and individual mail pieces within the bundles fall to the ground according to gravity. Generally, residential mailboxes are located near where the mail is dropped to avoid mail from falling in the wrong direction on the walkway. The mail is dropped into mailboxes from a height that may vary according to the location of the mailbox, the type of mail being dropped, and the volume of mail being delivered. Mail dropping standards set by the United States Postal Service, for example, set minimum and maximum heights for various delivery locations of mail. Mail collection machines may drop mail as close as ten feet to the mailboxes, however, because mail cannot be collected and sorted efficiently if mail is not placed into a correct orientation, the mail collection machines are usually placed very close to the mailbox so that mail is dropped into the mailboxes correctly. Typically, the mail collection machine will not stand very far from the mailbox, as the mail collection machine has a window through which the mail is dropped. The mail collection machine cannot be located very far from the mailbox, as the mail collection machine cannot be rotated around to be in the correct orientation for receiving mail. Mail collection machines are generally referred to as either in-line machines or downstream machines, depending on whether the machine was downstream of a
