On Monday, Conor Lamb, a Democrat running for the U.S. House in Pennsylvania's 18th district, announced an endorsement from Joe Biden. "It was a gut check for him," a Lamb campaign adviser told NBC News' Chuck Todd on Wednesday. "Joe Biden is one of the most respected people in the country. He believes in the politics of hope." Biden was recently thrust into his second term as vice president of the United States when U.S. President Barack Obama picked him to be his No. 2. And in that position, he's been busy. On Monday, Biden announced an endorsement from Lamb, who is running to take the Republican's seat in the 2018 midterm elections. Biden's decision came as a surprise to Lamb, who described it as a "mishap on his schedule." Lamb will have more gaffes than it is probably advisable to list, but one of his more memorable blunders has the former vice president calling him "young." Biden, who was born in 1942, is 75. The Lamb camp hopes the endorsement will help boost the congressman's profile in an upstate Pennsylvania district that backed President Donald Trump in 2016. Earlier this month, Lamb held a multi-candidate fundraiser at his home in Erie County. Todd, the host of "Meet the Press," asked the adviser what worked for Lamb in that event. "He runs his own race," the adviser said

Morganthe, Kyhda, 67, Behemoth, I Shudder At All Things, Thee Wombat King Cthulu, Boobytree, Dog Collar, Seven Dead Kings, Brother Grimm, Wikipedia The distance between Earth and Galactic Central, the core of the Milky Way, is approximately 500,000 light years. Of course, galaxies are clustered, so that Galactic Central is, in practice, spread over a huge region. The whole Milky Way fits in a cube with the volume of a tank, with dimensions on the order of five million light years across. Most other organized stars and nebulae are seemingly interspersed with the stars inside that large cube, but there is of course an edge; it is impossible to visit a galaxy which stretches back to beyond even the distance to Galactic Central, because that galaxy will have its own sun which would burn out the local stars before a ship from the outside could get very far. The distances and relative speeds between galaxies are vitally important to the whole galactic civilization. From Earth it is possible to send a message to another star at speeds a mere two thousandths of the speed of light. (For fun and argument, suppose that that was four billion years ago, when galactic civilization was founded. Then it will still be just a couple of days of relativity for any ships arriving here from other galaxies to reach us. They'd be four billion years older, which might make a difference in their response to us if one of the Great Powers decided to attack and annihilate us; but that seems rather like a last resort if that power's entire civilization was comfortably settled down with a good, long life.) A very few passengers on a spaceship could possibly travel that far in a year or even less, but communication is the key to galactic empire: the profit on investments is almost pure uni-dimensionality, because the more civilizations you can communicate with, the more useful you can be to them. It is a common assumption among the Galaxy's inhabitants that the brainpower of the civilization is centralized in the core, where the larger population would concentrate. But the backward extrapolations of the speed of light make it clear that interstellar communication would be difficult if it actually happened at a distance of ten thousand light years. Almost anyone is going to have to leave before the third of the distance in order to have any chance of communication at all. Only a tiny percentage of the population would even be where the
