A little known, but highly useful tool, is to delete this registry entry: HKEY_LOCAL_MACHINE\SOFTWARE\NSIS\MUI_TARGETOS\Registry\UninstallUninstallRegEntry The reason for the "cloak" in a semi-hidden registry key is that it makes the installer remove itself after it has installed. This can cause all sorts of problems with your registry, not to mention a missing uninstaller entry in the list of installed programs. It can cause unbootable installations, missing programs or even lead to your computer getting infected with a virus or malware. Windows 7 does this to a degree as well but not quite as strongly as XP/Vista. It's a pain, but it's not really a huge deal when you uninstall an older version and go to install a later version. But, if you can't see what that file is called and are worried about your computer rebooting without that file there then you can look it up here: It's the only command line solution I've found. Not sure why people recommend registry hacks as much as they do, because with just a few lines of code it could work just as well. I also recommend doing a chkdsk /f on the disk and/or a full fsck /f, but that's just personal preference. It didn't work for me and I'm using Windows 8.1. I first tried it in safe mode (which didn't work). It worked once I left safe mode. So I figured it must be the C:\ drive. I followed the instructions in the first post and now the files/folder that are created in C:\ are in the root directory of my SD card. I then used the keylogger to copy some files, which I am now deleting, but now I can't find any of the files I copied using the keylogger. When I used the program, the file names look like this:
acacxiekacihkwxkaakjhacckpkhacacjkhkakhkfkpkjhkacjkhhkakhkfkjhkfkpkhacjkhhkakhkfkjhkfkpkhacjkhkakhkfkjhk
