undergone a big revamp designed to leverage the performance of the new Intel Xeon Gold 6148 processor-the first to be Intel's new Sprout Lake architecture-known as "Braswell". This architecture was designed partly in response to demands from content creation platform users, some of whom were understandably unhappy with the old Haswell microarchitecture design. The new software has a more "intelligent" approach to balance application performance for the best possible workflows; and in doing so, it does so with as little impact to the end user as possible. The new system uses the new "Accelerated Execution Environment" and "Accelerated Compositing Engines" to improve performance where it matters most. These features are available in some of the most used tasks, "e.g., layers and filters. The new processing speed is enabled at the platform level. New features to Photoshop include new adjustment layers, the ability to use Studio products (set of 64-bit plug-ins) in Photoshop, a new feature called Extend, as well as new features for video editing.
