That's the message from ICANN president Fadi Chehadé in a letter sent to ICANN members. Chehadé said he was taking a final decision after days of debate at the ICANN meeting in Baku, Azerbaijan. ICANN's old domain name root, gsroot.net, was moved to a new space in 2005 and the organization was supposed to make the move by the end of last year. But after two years of delay in moving to the new space, the root zone faced an uphill battle from the United States government. That's because the country owns the address space that is controlled by ICANN. One of ICANN's objectives is to make the root zone internet-neutral. But the United States government believed the transition would have to be linked to international negotiations on Internet addresses, which are controlled by ICANN. "As a result, USA and its member states could not participate in the process or may participate to a limited extent," Chehadé wrote in the letter sent this week. "In addition, the USA has expressed concern about the neutrality of the process as it should have been left to the best technical minds in the IANA community." ICANN has struggled to attract technical expertise to lead its domain name root zone. Chehadé stressed in the letter that ICANN "wants to ensure a free and transparent global Internet environment," but "this requires international participation and consensus." "The end result is
