More than a million polypectomies are performed each year in the United States. Colonoscopy is also being used for the diagnosis and treatment of other diseases. Colonoscopy is, however, an invasive, unpleasant, and laborious procedure. The patient must first be anesthetized. A colonoscope is then inserted into the patient's colon. The patient is required to lie on his or her left side and often to remain in this position for several hours or longer. If the patient is not sedated, the patient typically feels quite uncomfortable during the procedure. The entire procedure is time consuming and expensive, particularly when the results are negative. This is a procedure in which it is generally difficult to determine if, and where, polyps have been removed. Thus, if a polyp is not seen or removed during the colonoscopy, the colonoscopy is repeated. If during the subsequent colonoscopy, another polyp is found, additional polyps may be removed and more colonoscopies may be required. In some patients, particularly when sedation is used, it is very difficult, if not impossible, to determine if a polyp has been removed during the first colonoscopy. Removal of polyps by colonoscopy is the only real "cure" for colon cancer. Thus, when polyps are detected and removed, the likelihood of colon cancer is reduced. Over the last decade, the
