A: There are some slight differences in those 2 images, such as the scene, the resolution, and the focal point. Also, both of them were saved as JPEG, a common image format. When saving in the same image format (JPEG), both results are the same. You can save the image with a lower resolution to see the differences. Also, you could use the Blur Gallery Tool which is a free tool for that. Save the Blur Gallery Tool as a JPEG. Open the Blur Gallery Tool. Add the pics you want to save. Add a short title for your image. Clicking the blur icon generates the blurred image. Open the blur gallery tool again. You could also save only the blurred pic by selecting the part you want to see and then you would need to add the blur gallery tool and it will create the blurred image. Happy Shaking. Q: How to prevent an application from removing itself when accessed via Google Play? There are many occasions where my applications is removed by Google Play because I used permissions that are not required on my applications but not that I would want Google Play to remove my application. Is there a way to prevent Google Play to remove my applications when it is accessed via Google Play? I don't want to give read-only permissions to the applications because I would like to give read and write permissions and the user will only read the contents of the DB. A: I had the same issue, and solved it with your answer. I needed to add the WRITE_SECURE_SETTINGS permission, but as you say, I don't want the user to be able to modify system settings. An alternative solution is described here. Since you want to only allow the user to view your data, you could then allow access to your data in Settings. Q: Azure Function - Setting a Timestamp I have an Azure function that saves an object to an SQL database every two minutes. The time of day I run the function is not important, rather the month and day. I want to be able to save to the db any day and any month for a particular year. The function is set up like so: [FunctionName("AddNew")]
public static void AddNew([TimerTrigger("00:00:02", RunOnStartup=false)] Tim

Accumulating evidence has emerged from epidemiological studies and clinical trials that suggest a role for fruit and vegetable intake in Alzheimer's disease (AD) prevention. Several studies have demonstrated significant associations between consumption of cruciferous vegetables and reduced risk of developing AD. In vitro studies have suggested several mechanisms by which the antioxidants and various bioactive compounds from cruciferous vegetables may alter AD risk, including oxidative stress reduction, anti-inflammatory effects, and inhibition of amyloid precursor protein (APP) processing. In addition to their antioxidant and anti-inflammatory properties, some plant-based compounds found in cruciferous vegetables have recently been shown to stabilize APP and inhibit its processing into the amyloid- β -peptide (A β). Together, these mechanisms provide a basis for an additive or synergistic effect of intake of cruciferous vegetables in AD prevention. We propose to conduct a pilot study in which 4/5 of the participants will be recruited from the Rochester Epidemiology Project, a well-established and richly characterized population-based cohort that has been used to identify risk factors for AD and to examine the association between lifestyle factors and dementia and cognitive decline. The remaining participants will be recruited from the Rochester Memory and Aging Project, a recent recruitment effort begun within the Rochester Epidemiology Project that is focused on assessing the association between AD risk factors and decline in cognitive functioning. We propose to study the association between intake of cruciferous vegetables and AD and cognitive decline and to examine the possible mechanisms by which cruciferous vegetable consumption may attenuate or prevent AD by determining whether intake is associated with altered levels of inflammatory markers, oxidative stress, APP processing, or other molecules that may be important in the pathogenesis of AD. The training components of this career development award will consist of a structured set of didactic courses and longitudinal mentoring designed to develop the applicant into an independent investigator who has the skills and foundation necessary to conduct clinical translational research with the purpose of eventually establishing nutritional interventions as an approach to AD prevention.
