WASHINGTON - A retired deputy sheriff from Prince George's County, Maryland, told a Fort Lauderdale, Florida, newspaper on Monday that he was one of the former slaves attacked and threw rocks at Robert Smalls, a runaway slave and major figure in the Battle of Secessionville in July 1861. The newspaper, the Sun-Sentinel, said retired Deputy Sheriff Robert Smalls, 62, made the accusation to reporters on Monday at a previously scheduled news conference in D.C. to commemorate the 150th anniversary of the Civil War battle. A crowd of about 75 people turned out for the news conference, including members of the Smalls family and some descendants of the man who reportedly first approached Smalls after the battle and asked if he was "that n" who helped lead the raid on Secessionville. The confrontation came three weeks after the battle, when Secessionville's residents overthrew the Union Navy blockade and declared their new nation, the Confederate States of America. Robert Smalls was court marshaled in 1861 and sent to prison for three years. Robert Smalls, a black-Union soldier, was court marshaled in 1861 for his role in the July 1861 battle. He was given a $500 fine and a $50 court surcharge for assisting in overthrowing the United States' blockade of Southern ports. The charge was later upgraded to a $100 fine and a $50 court surcharge. Three members of the Smalls family protested the fine at the time. "We have come down to the court house today to take a look at the record of this black man. We are here today to see if he is truly guilty of what has been alleged against him in order to see if his record will be written down as an honorable record and recorded in history," the family said. William Woods, a spokesman for the Smalls family, told the Sun-Sentinel on Monday that it was his father who, as an African American himself, helped launch a boycott of Prince George's County businesses and "force 6d123a050
