The vertebrate embryo shows a number of similarities to the simple animal models, such as the C. elegans embryo, Drosophila, and Hydra. However, only the vertebrate embryo has a well-organized, three-dimensional organization, which facilitates tissue interactions. As in other metazoan organisms, molecular signals control the specification of cell fate in the vertebrate embryo. In C. elegans, Drosophila, Hydra, and many other organisms, these signals are protein, and in most cases there is considerable homology to known gene products. Although morphogenesis occurs from the top-down, genetic organizers are also found throughout the embryo. The function of these organizers is likely to be to allow for the correct interpretation of other molecular signals that initiate specific programs of gene activation, and there is increasing evidence to support this idea. In vertebrates, the organizer may be involved in the molecular control of the formation of the neural tube, although the details of this process have yet to be clarified. Synchronous digital data transfers between computer systems require a multiplexer circuit for achieving the data transfer. In the past, two approaches have been used in this regard. The first approach involves multiplexing the data to be transferred either onto a single transmission medium, as shown in U.S. Pat. No. 4,378,261, or onto multiple separate transmission media, as shown in U.S. Pat. No. 4,389,523. These circuits represent a two step multiplexing process for highspeed data transmission. The second approach involves simultaneously transmitting the data on separate transmission media, as shown in U.S
