The University of Rochester, Department of Obstetrics and Gynecology's (URO) High-Risk Perinatal Cooperative Research Group (HRPG) is one of 11 international sites in the NICHD-sponsored Maternal Fetal Medicine Units Network (MFMU), and one of seven sites in the European Network on Antenatal Care (ENGAND). In collaboration with the investigators in the ENGAND Network, the UR Hospital has been accepted as a MFMU site, and is contributing to its development and growth. The underlying theme of the proposed URO MFMU Network is that perinatal healthcare should be provided with a focus on the mother, fetus and family with a goal of reducing infant morbidity and mortality. The infant mortality rate in Rochester (8.3 per 1,000) is higher than the national rate (6.8/1000) and is exceeded by many metropolitan areas including San Francisco (10.2/1000), Los Angeles (10.8/1000) and Chicago (12.0/1000). The high rate of infant mortality in Rochester has also been documented by the State Department of Health, as it has been for the last decade. The UR Hospital is a Level III Comprehensive Perinatal Center with neonatal intensive care, excellent maternal-fetal medicine, and advanced anesthetic, surgical, and gynecologic services that are State of New York approved and thus serving the tri-county population of 1,780,000. Focused efforts to improve the quality of maternal-fetal healthcare in Rochester are a critical component of the MFMU Network. The MFMU Network brings together a multidisciplinary team of physicians to address the key problem areas of poor perinatal outcomes and the role that maternal health plays in the outcome of the perinatal period. This new project proposes to develop the core components of a MFMU Network, create

This invention relates generally to control valves and more particularly to a control valve having a movable pilot spool for controlling the flow of fluid to and from a pilot controlled servo valve. Power fluid flows through an internal combustion engine. When the engine is operating, considerable mechanical power is converted to the flow of a combustible mixture of fuel and air. If for any reason, engine power decreases below a specified minimum, the supply of fluid to the engine is shut off so that the engine does not function. Engine power which falls below the specified minimum usually results from an engine failure or a defect in the engine or in a component associated with the engine. Because the engine may not operate properly until one or more components associated with the engine have been repaired or replaced, it is desirable for emergency vehicles to be equipped with a fluid power emergency fluid power system which automatically shuts off engine power below a specified minimum in the event of engine malfunction. A number of electronic, pneumatic, and hydraulic systems are used to automatically shut down a tractor engine. All systems employ a means to detect a malfunction in the engine. The sensors used to detect engine malfunction are typically either mechanical or electronic. Mechanical sensors include differential pressure switches, mechanical monitoring devices, and various types of engine overrun devices. The most common types of electronic engine malfunction detection devices are engine overspeed control circuits and control of various engine functions. Known engine overspeed control circuits usually comprise a microprocessor controlled circuit which detects a mechanical or electrical malfunction in the engine before the engine reaches its overspeed condition. Engine malfunction detection circuits also detect an overspeed condition and are used to prevent a component of the engine from generating too much torque, such as an overspeed condition on the axle. The engine malfunction detection circuits used to prevent overspeed conditions are not capable of interrupting the fuel supply to the engine once an overspeed condition is detected. It is known to stop engine power using a combination of a fluid control valve and a servo valve which are commonly called "power cut-off" control valves. This type of valve system is typically employed
