Compiled with the q option, the objects file is large, 9.85 MB. When we use lldb to debug the program, it only shows the errors in the code (such as segfault), and it doesn't show the data between the errors, which is very difficult to track down. We were wondering if there is any way to use gdb to debug libc++ code, or any other better way? The debug information for the code is very helpful, but if we only use gdb to debug, we will need to wait until the compiled object file is even larger. A: GDB doesn't work for libc++ because the debugging information contains libc++-internal information which is not accessible from GDB. You can use LLDB instead. Merveilleux
