Hematological differences in progeny of varying lineages of mice selected for high or low protein. Mice derived from a high-protein line and from a low-protein line were mated to produce progeny that were then selected for high or low hemoglobin. The high-line mice had a lower hemoglobin concentration than did the low-line mice. On the other hand, the low-line mice had lower mean cell hemoglobin concentration than did the high-line mice.

This decrease in cell hemoglobin was accompanied by increases in plasma albumin concentration and in plasma osmotic pressure. The shifts in protein concentration away from the plasma to the cells in the low-line mice were due mainly to increased production of albumin and less to increased production of hemoglobin. Second stroke after cerebral aneurysm rupture: an underdiagnosed and deadly complication. Stroke due to cerebral aneurysms is a relatively common complication among adult patients with intracerebral aneurysms. Rupture of cerebral aneurysms is associated with high rates of morbidity and mortality. Previous reports have suggested that most cerebral aneurysm ruptures occur in the first year after initial diagnosis and that patients with initial subarachnoid hemorrhage have a higher chance of experiencing a second stroke event. We conducted an observational study of 893 consecutive patients with intracerebral aneurysms to identify the prevalence and clinical characteristics of those who had a second stroke event, with emphasis on subarachnoid hemorrhage as the first stroke event. After a mean follow-up of 38 months, 26 (2.9%) of 893 patients had experienced a second stroke event, most of which (20) were due to subarachnoid hemorrhage. The cumulative probability of a second stroke event was 22.3% at 1 year, 38.5% at 5 years, and 70.3% at 10 years. Fifteen of 26 patients with a second stroke event were previously diagnosed as having aneurysms that ruptured. The cumulative probability of a second stroke event was 4.3%, 8.6%, and 24.3% after 1, 5, and 10 years of initial hemorrhage, respectively. Thus, the risk of a second stroke event was low after the first event and increased rapidly after the initial hemorrhage event. We conclude that subarachnoid hemorrhage should always be considered a possible indication for clinical work-up of patients with cerebral

What's New in the?

Polychlorinated
Biphenyls (PCBs) and Organochlorine
Pesticides in Eggs
from a Tien Shan Ecosystem Reserve.
Polochlorinated biphenyls (PCBs) and
DDT/DDE

metabolites are associated with the persistence of these persistent organic pollutants (POPs) in the environment. Determining the concentrations of polychlorinated biphenyls (PCBs) and

DDTs in egg samples from remote mountain refugia could prove to be informative on the levels of POPs in the animal feeding and food web associated with mountain ecosystems. In this study, we determined

both concentrations and profiles of 209
and 47 polychlorinated
biphenyl congeners
(PCB) and
DDTs/DDDD/DDE
metabolites in eggs
from Laohugou Valley
Nature Reserve,
Sichuan Province,

China. Levels of Pb were found to be higher than those of the previous reports. DDE (pesticide metabolite) was the predominant DDT congener, accounting for 61.3% of DDTs detected, followed by

DDD (36.2%), DDDD (1.7%), and DDT (0.5%). PCB congeners revealed a typical pattern of decreased chlorination as the number of chlorines increases. Total lipid content of the egg samples ranged from 35.3% to 42.3% of wet egg mass. Hexachlorocyclohexane (HCH) isomers, including α -HCH, β -HCH, γ -HCH, and δ -HCH, were present at concentrations ranging from 13.0 ng/g wet egg weight to 17.2

ng/g wet egg weight.
The concentrations of HCHs, the concentrations and pattern of HCH
profiles were similar to those of a previous study in the Yana and Selenga rivers of the Sakhalin region, in the Russian Far East.

HCH concentrations in the egg samples were significantly correlated with the concentrations of the HCHs in the air of the Laohugou Valley

Nature Reserve. DDTs

concentrations were also significantly correlated with air concentrations of DDTs. In addition, POP concentrations were significantly correlated with concentrations of other POPs. To our knowledge, this is the first study of PCB and HCH concentrations and profiles in eggs from an alpine ecosystem in Asia./
