Syllabus à faire. O'Connor, a federal appeals court judge, who has since hinted that a court decision for Warshak would be "a big deal." "I'd like to think that we have accomplished some of that, too, but we haven't," said Warshak, who was among a group of plaintiffs who filed a Supreme Court case in December in which they argued a judge should have to personally appear before a group of defendants to conclude a criminal case. Warshak, who said he has received numerous job offers, is considering a major motion to the court that would seek to end the secrecy of the entire process, make the guidelines available to the public and end the requirement that victims sign non-disclosure agreements, such as the one that came as part of his plea deal. David Weinstein, a lawyer who represents Warshak, said he expects the Supreme Court to "consider a case on the merits," before ruling in the case. Warshak is calling the accusations against him "categorically false." He is upset that the first indictment and guilty plea were filed under seal and released to the public. He said the documents - especially a statement of facts filed under seal which outlines the accusations - were changed at his request. "The language that they used in this statement of facts was not reflective of what went down in the case," he said. He said many of the statements were "factually unverifiable" and based on hearsay. Noting a reference to a "chatroom" on the Silk Road website in the statement of facts, Warshak said he never participated in any such online chatroom. "The
