REVIEWS DEMON NIGHT GAMEPLAY: REVIEWS DEMON NIGHT Elden Ring Activation Code: DANGER_DOG: How can I implement a modular and loosely coupled design pattern for an MVC web app? I am writing a web app that will be using MVC. The scope of the project is to make use of technologies that I don't have the familiarity with yet. To make use of the modularity of my design, I made the following abstraction: I have a controller which then makes use of a number of models that implement a common interface. The model classes take in database queries, create some display-specific logic to format that data, and then return the data in a corresponding type, e.g. a model for a sql query would return a List of strings or something. I'm having a bit of trouble getting on top of the c# part of this, specifically how you go about implementing a Model interface (i.e. an interface that all models should implements). It seems that the only way I can encapsulate the model logic is if I have a concrete instance of all the models in my controller, which seems a bit inefficient. Am I understanding the problem correctly? A: Yes, this is an issue with any tightly coupled architecture: one or more classes know so much about the rest of the code that they are forced to have a fairly complex architecture. I like to think of it in terms of "run-time coupling": what you need is a separable class, a class that exposes a strong facade, but does not contain any logic. When you run the application, the logic is written in another class, and it is passed the data which it applies to using its strong facade. In a typical MVC application, the model is an object created by a framework like Spring Data; Spring Data manages persistence and provides a strong facade, not allowing the model to contain implementation details. In your example, the controllers are not really a suitable place to put the models because they both have specific concerns. They should provide your data and your view bff6bb2d33
