I'm currently studying a course on assembly. Is there an explanation (somewhere) why these processors use a switching register? If the top part of the diagram (for the n-th instruction being executed) is trying to find the previous instruction's program counter (which is stored in a register called PC), then why can't it simply refer to the register's value? If a register is a shared/single-use resource, what problem is being solved by a switch-register? A: What do you mean by register? Registers are just a way for the cpu to keep track of things while they are being executed. They are used for small, independent things, rather than as general purpose containers. For example, if you wanted to keep track of the current variable in a loop, you could have a register in the loop, or you 82138339de
