downloading a torrent file is much like a movie. it's a continuous stream, or a playlist for a radio station. the only difference is, a movie is a one time purchase - you have to make sure you have enough bandwidth available to download it in the first place. if you're not careful, that could mean sacrificing the games that you spent time playing. the scenario will be similar to this: you're watching a torrent file that starts off at 100kbs, which you can only maintain for about 2 hours before it starts dropping. you end up downloading at 5kbs and the file ends up taking 20 hours to complete. in short, torrents are designed to be used as a streaming service for internet users. they're also extremely inefficient because most people only download a small portion of the file. if you're serious about gaming, you'll want to eliminate the high latency of torrents. maybe you've bought a new game and discovered the bad news: it's not available on all of your video game consoles, it's not on the platform you game on most often, or it simply lacks. this is where it can get embarrassing because you'll have to go the old-fashioned way of purchasing it. however, most modern video games are designed to be played via purchase. there are all kinds of online stores, digital download services, and even torrent websites, that specialize in selling video games to users. the downside is that it can be a hassle and inconvenient to download these games. it may be convenient to download a torrent, but it can also be a hassle. in fact, the first video streamers were gamers. some of the earliest video streams created were involved in playing video games. since then, the content on these streams has evolved to more and more - some streamers broadcast regular everyday shows and movies from their channels - complete with music, news, information, and more. these internet shows offer lots of value to users, especially for those with less time to devote to media streaming than they would like. as the popularity of streaming media has increased, the number of dedicated media streamers has also grown exponentially.
