They are right: what I am really searching is this: a game that I can play using this hardware (I don't care about the real goal of the game) (as in google earth, or Pong, for example) with low requirements, because the computer is a very weak thing at this moment (not only for office tasks, but for pleasure as well, since I hate to wait long time on the PC) and this is a really difficult task for me. Some feedbacks: - is there a software to run the game on windows? I really do not want to install a specific version of wine (for example because I want to play with the same version than the PC where I downloaded the game) - I'm ok with buying a lot of games on Steam, but the thing is that I don't want Steam to receive all my money. Also, I didn't find a "unsubscribe" button, that would be a problem if I really need to stop to use Steam. - I like the idea to use the computer as a game controller. I mean, in the Apple store I found this game that was a real game in front of me, but I had to use my fingers instead of my computer's mouse. A: You could use Google Earth for this, but you'll still have to download the program from the Google site. For example: You could also try out Star Chart, which will let you fly your spaceship around the globe. It's an open source and free to use: A geopolitical game that the US has no interest in playing - leethax 0cc13bf012
