The term was used for the first time in 2004, in a publication by David F. Noble (p. 9). The original authors of "Cognitive History" were David G. Noble and Charles T. Wolfe. In 2012, this group reconvened to define and defend "Cognitive History", and published their Principles of Cognitive History (Noble & Wolfe, 2012). The most recent authors include Noblett, Curran, Cochrane, and Gray (2011) and Noble and Gray (2015). The foundations of cognitive history Cognitive history is founded on three principles: 1. Past-perspectives. People are not the only source of historical information. Other sources include historical documents (written records), archaeological remains, artifacts, oral histories, folk cultures, etc. (Most historians and researchers now try to collect and use this range of primary sources.) 2. Peripheral sources. Peripheral sources include things that we cannot put our finger on: books, art, toys, music, folk-tales, sayings, ideas, etc. All these things are important in building a picture of the past because they suggest that we are missing something if we limit ourselves to primary sources. 3. Narrative History. The "narrative of history" includes the sort of things that people say in oral history (oratory, dicography) and the written words of historians or historians. Narrative history is most interesting because it forces people to answer questions about human nature. Discipline The main field of Cognitive History is cognitive historiography (Noble, 2006). It is in the field of history, but also has very close connections to anthropology, communication, psychology, and literary studies. A completely different field of cognitive history is "Nordic Cognitive History" which focuses on Scandinavia (Noble, 2007). History and cultural history are two related disciplines in the field of Cognitive History. Principles of Cognitive History The Principles of Cognitive History was first published by David G. Noble and 04aeff104c
