Wow i am feeling really old.Content Google Analytics, the tool that collects information about the behavior of visitors to your website, may have misled several tech companies by sending them misleading data in the past. This affects three Google services: the webmaster tools, the AdSense ads and the "developer console." Google has, at least temporarily, stopped delivering this information to the organizations involved, and committed to figuring out what's going on before taking further action. The issue was brought up after a service called Xtremecorp reported to webmaster groups that Google Webmaster Tools were sending them false data: the ad serving panels were blaming people for clicks that were, in fact, legitimate. (Before you say anything, know that Google AdSense has been the source of no such scandal. There are many similarities, however, so they're counted with this story.) In a letter published on a mailing list for webmaster groups, Matt Cutts, a product manager for Google Search, outlines what happened and what Google has done: In some cases, we believe that members of the webmaster community were unintentionally given incorrect information about their own sites. Unfortunately, at least two webmasters made the mistake of providing Google with what they believed was correct data, and this led to Google providing incorrect data to their own webmaster tools. This was first reported by a site called The Good One. Basically, this site would point out that if your site was receiving spam click traffic, you might want to check your analytics or your AdSense account for incorrect data. Google's service for checking your AdSense account wasn't carrying traffic that was being mapped to your domain name. The problem with what happened was that Google (and other service) was displaying an impression that was not something legitimate. Cutts explains: This means that the impressions were not coming from the user's own site and
