If you still use the Flex library to import data from smartphones, you are missing out on the ability to take advantage of your customer's amazing photographs. In many ways, the leap from Flex to Mobile is like the leap from image processing to lightroom. So why not just do that? And that's exactly what Quark does. Their iQuark product is a full featured mobile design and development application from Adobe. Support for the popular iPad has been added to Adobe Photoshop Creative Cloud. Now you can get all the latest release of Photoshop slowly and safely on your tablet. As with other Creative Cloud products, new features will automatically be added to your software with monthly updates. And you can be sure that there will be no subscription plan needed to receive all new features. All in all, I think that Lightroom's Ruby interface is quite helpful, but that it could be even more useful by taking full advantage of the powerful concept of database-like reference points. After all, we have just that in the RAW and JPEG image data. Using a reference point wherever an image is stored in the database could certainly help with performance. For example, the image data needs to be decompressed to some extent, but eliminating that completely would save us on disk space. Or we could eliminate that process as well. I know that we have such processing features in Photoshop, but I am not sure how much they are actually used. There's plenty of potential here, but only Adobe knows for sure how to tap into it all.

AUDIO: As technology undergoes a transformation, it has become apparent that traditional ring-modem technologies have become a bottleneck in the audio. For high fidelity audio, internet based technologies provide an ideal solution. These technologies are widely used for high fidelity desktop audio such as DJing, podcasts or radio stations. Since video conferencing is one of the most promising applications of audio – due to the multiplicity of opportunities to use voice in addition to video – the rapid development of technologies is transforming and enhancing coexistence. For intercom audio, Internet technology is providing a platform that would not be available at least 20 years ago. The proliferation of VoIP (Voice over Internet Protocol) in highly developed countries such as France and UK enables people to enjoy clear and free communication. When using the Internet, audio quality has been improved significantly. In addition, the availability of multi-channel audio using a Software Defined Radio (SDR) with a PC is also rapidly evolving and it is expected to become a new format for audio broadcasting. These two examples illustrate the strong interdependence of new technologies.
