A number of such plants are utilized in bouquets. For instance, many geraniums and roses are very fragile. Such plants should be handled with extreme care to prevent damage. The garden center and florist markets sell plants in potted containers of glass, clay, earthenware or pottery. An economic container has the following characteristics: it should be inexpensive and it must be able to be reused for any number of years. The container must provide air circulation, soil drainage and a means of water retention. The container must also provide protection from physical damage, which means that it must have some degree of "breakability". While some potted plants may be handled with bare hands, many plants, including flowers, require protective equipment to protect the plant from physical damage. For example, the stem and leaves of a geranium are extremely sensitive to breakage. Potted flowers must be handled by a trained nursery attendant, who wears protective gloves and protective garments such as boots, apron and long sleeves. Among the protective garments and equipment worn by nursery attendants is flower basket. In many instances, the flower basket is reusable. Typically the flower basket is composed of a container with a handle. In other instances, the flower basket is composed of a woven blanket that is strapped to the back by a strap and is used to bundle together several flowers. In either case, the flower basket must be easily transported between the place of purchase and the home of the buyer. Traditionally, the flower basket is carried from a florist shop to a customer's home by means of a cart, dolly, dolly wagon or cart carrier. In some cases, the flower basket is not taken along with the customer to the home. At the home the flower basket is loaded into a car for transportation to the florist shop and/or home of the customer. The florist shop may have several flower baskets filled with flowers. In either case, the florist shop or the customer must be able to sort and catalog the flower baskets. A longstanding need exists for a flower container which is inexpensive to manufacture, can be reused and reused, is durable
