How Photoshop Works in Common Before you can start designing anything, you first need an image that you plan to use for your design. To create a raster image, choose File » New, and make sure that there is a tick in the raster image box. That option will open the New dialog box, with a box that says "No Preview" in the bottom-right corner. Click OK to open the window that lets you choose the type of file you are creating (JPEG, TIFF, GIF, or PNG) and a resolution. Choose a different file format if you have a different graphic in mind, or if you're going to be downloading a picture from the Web. You can make this new image as large or as small as you like, by clicking the canvas-size box in the lower-right corner. If you want to see the resulting image before you commit, click the preview button in the lower-left corner. After you click OK, Photoshop opens a document window, where you can type or import text, shapes, or drop shadows. For this step, you'll want to start with a simple image. After you choose a new image, Photoshop creates a new document window and an image layer that contains the new canvas. You'll notice a small box at the bottom of the image layer, which displays the name of the current layer. If there are no names, the name of the document is displayed at the bottom of the new image layer. Drag shapes, text, or other objects to the canvas, and click to place them. By default, the size of the canvas in Photoshop is 100 pixels across and 75 pixels tall. To change these dimensions, click the canvas size box at the bottom of the Canvas window (figure 1). At the bottom of the Canvas window, there's also a rectangle called the Selection toolbox that contains various tools for selecting portions of your document. You can use the Selection tool to drag and resize the image, or to grab and drag around objects on the document. You can also use the eyedropper tool to choose colors or brush settings, and the paint bucket tool to paint with a thin color overlay. Click one of the layers in the Layers palette, in the bottom left of the screen, and you'll notice that a small yellow box with an arrow appears next to the layer name. Click the yellow box, and the box turns red, and the name of the layer changes to the title
