In the latest update for Lightroom, the rating options were updated and the sections you're just about to add a shortcut to were added to the panel to save time. They sync with Adobe Lightroom and can be synced to your device. You can also sort a list of photos by any of these topics: date, time, rating, or RAW exposure mode. This is very easy to do with the new section on the left. > More "Subset" option is also a new one. This allows you to look at only images with certain metadata data. Updated metadata even works as filters. You can also do neat things with the focus points, which can be added directly in the box where you select the focal length using the "ART" command of Lightroom. Unfortunately, while this function works great, it's very limited. What troubles us the most in Lightroom 5 is that it still uses the same cropped 48 megapixel frame when you view images. As of now, you can control it if you decide to crop a photo yourself, and this should be a no-brainer. But the interface has changed in the way that the interface is displayed to the right, and this doesn't allow you to zoom in, which is annoying.
