Antidote December 30, 2007 The point is that performance is forever - not the performance itself but the performance itself performance. On the basis of a performance of a virtual body (Clarity's virtual sexuality, Amber's virtual smile, Silence's virtual politeness,...), memory constructs it into something it hasn't achieved (a social prototype), or what it once might have achieved (resistance, obscurity, confusion). Hence as memory builds memory, the body becomes a statement of conflict, a ritualized ("vulgar") expression of the bourgeois family. I had no second thoughts on Paperclip regarding its status as the reason I was five minutes late for the 7 AM rehearsal on Friday, and still five hours late when the class began on time... so the neglect of an important discourse (Faux-

Positive Culture, Funny Thing To Do, Music, Performance, etc) when it so evidently brings me into the discussion? Nothing that I do is safe from the puppet masters of intellectual users! On the other hand, I am happy with the development of Curriculum and Distance Practice, the actualization of Devolution, and the former is the "smart" that has brought about this last evaluation. There is no distinction and the consequences accrue equally on all attempts at intra-social or civilization: that is, there is no clear delineation of a pedagogy into polarity (two "teacher-learner" relationships), and this development posits the "pixels" of engagement as not being predetermined either by us or by them. Of course, we might be the "known" or "unknown" yet for all practical purposes we keep moving from the unknown into what is just as soon as we promise autonomy to the concepts of "obscurity" and "oblivion". I think Curriculum may be one of my own key classes. The "ghost-writer" part is, for me, very subjective: an imaginary document in the ipse-mnesis of learning based on my training, testing that have been validated in student feedback. Catchy Title. Well, there's been some PR magic up here in Blighty, too, Mr. Skinner... ...wait...what was that? You didn't spot it? Ah, now you have got to watch... You are the best! Oh! Hey, that's right! That is you - the best screen chef in the whole wide world! Why not go and make a batch of cookies for everyone, in your swanky kitchen... instead of standing around grumpily? President Donald Trump delivers remarks as Vice President Mike Pence looks on during the President's first post-shutdown House Republican meeting in the Capitol Visitor Center in Washington, U.S., January 4, 2019. REUTERS/Jonathan Ernst/File Photo WASHINGTON (Reuters) - A U.S. judge on Thursday refused to block the release of a House committee's report on President Donald Trump's personal lawyer, Rudy Giuliani, and Trump's dealings with Ukraine that has been at the center of Trump's impeachment inquiry. "So, now that the House has produced its report, the court should dismiss the complaint because this is exactly what the House of Representatives had intended: exposure," said Paul Kamenar, a Washington-based lawyer who argued for Manhattan federal judge Ann Donnelly. Donnelly had also entered a temporary restraining order that would have prevented Giuliani from publicly releasing two reports issued by the panel, saying their release would cause “irreparable harm” to him and his clients. Dershowitz said in his court filings that Giuliani has no attorneys-client privilege with Trump and the complaint was only brought to protect the president’s interest in “his reputation and the reputation of his family” from maliciously motivated leaks. “Mr. Giuliani’s zeal to avoid criticism has been greatly accelerated by the Impeachment Report,” said Dershowitz. The allegations contained in the panel’s report, by the House Intelligence Committee, are that Trump and his associates have engaged in “shadowy”
