the genesis version of galaga is an impressive conversion of the arcade classic, and it captures the essence of the original in its pixelated sprite graphics and erratic pace. there's a single plane, but after that, there's only space to shoot. the final boss in the game, pacman himself, is a collection of all the other bosses, and there's an area where there's one of each. it ends with an epic showdown with pacman himself, who splits into two: one of them is a giant, and the other is a little, meek pacman. these last two are the true masterpieces of the game, and are almost enough to make the game worthwhile in their own right. there are two endings, so it won't be a surprise if you get a different one depending on your performance in the game. it's a fitting finale, since the game was designed with the era of arcade games in mind. the game continues in the same vein as galaga. eighteen stages of high-speed shooting action. the game is a total conversion of the original amiga version of the game, which was a true masterpiece. it was an artform in its own right, and was probably one of the most successful conversions of a game into an artform. the amiga version of the art of motion was essentially an arcade game with a bit more finesse. this takes things a step further by adding a bit of speed and a lot of variety, and you get a total conversion of the original game, all done by one man. the game has some unique features, like the ability to use the spacebar to slow down time, and the ability to slow down when you're getting hit. you get more lives, and have a choice of 7 different ship designs. you can even play as one of the bosses! there are also some pretty interesting bosses, such as the titanic whale-like boss, and the locomotive boss.
