Effect of temperature and thermal cycling on mechanical properties of two types of glass-ionomer cements. The aim of the study was to evaluate in vitro the compressive strength and diameter stability of two types of glass-ionomer cements: 1) Cement-1 is a conventional glass-ionomer cement; 2) Cement-2 is a new type of glass-ionomer cement produced by mixing resin, glass powder, and a polymer. Diameters of the restorations were measured immediately after construction and after 30 days. The diameters of the Cement-2 restorations were similar to those of the Cement-1 restorations. The average diameters of the Cement-2 restorations were smaller than those of the Cement-1 restorations. At D3, the diameters of Cement-1 restorations were significantly larger than those of the Cement-2 restorations.
