A few years ago, American Xerox in Sammamish, Washington, had a clear system of goal throughout the company: "simplify, increase employee productivity, reduce energy consumption and costs and promote a green culture." To achieve these goals, Xerox invested in the latest technology, in less than a year it made a total reduction in energy consumption of 48 percent. The company also reduced its annual costs by 30 percent, reduced its emission in terms of CO2 by 50 percent and its waste by 30 percent. All this was possible without compromising quality. With this track record, Xerox would be an ideal target to be the first company in Europe to receive an Energy Star certification. More than 250 people were involved in the process of developing the strategy of the company. achieve a 15 to 20 percent reduction in energy usage. The results were impressive; the company was given an Energy Star certification for Energy-Efficiency and Environmental Leadership (E3L) and achieved a maximum saving of 12.6 million kilowatts (or 13.5 million kilowatt-hours per year). The company also reduced its energy by 1,200 million kilowatt-hours. In addition, Xerox received the Carbon Leadership Recognition (CLR) as the world's most environmentally-friendly company. "Our aim was to make the work carried out by our employees as efficient and effective as possible, while also promoting a more green and sustainable environment. This is the kind of thing that is necessary," said John H.
