disables a file recovery feature in windows and microsoft office. the windows recovery services are used to recover files and folders, but the recovermyfiles tool allows the user to scan for any recoverable file. the tool also allows the creation of a hash of the selected files or folders. the hash is protected using a 256-bit encryption algorithm, and on windows 8.1 the hash is stored in the os in such a way that it is unreadable. the tool allows the user to select the target file(s) of the attack, such as a document or a presentation. when selected, the tool will show the recoverable file content, and the file will be encrypted with the decryption keys (dictionaries) published on the stackoverflow.com site by glaucous. all the keys are encrypted using the same hash as the filename hash. the tool will even provide all the keys needed for decryption. this tool allows the decryption of the files even in the windows file recovery tool. the decrypted content is not reported in any way when the file content is displayed. similarly, recovermyfileschaos is a tool that allows the user to scan for and recover files that are stored in the windows recycle bin. the tool only requires that the bin is unlocked, and the user can select the files to recover, among other options. a good way to use these tools to perform file recovery on your target is to combine the tools, selecting multiple files that the target might have stored or created. if the tool is unable to recover the file, it might be that the target has not stored it or has not created it yet. the file name contains a timestamp, and the user must modify the file name, for example by removing the timestamp, before the file can be recovered. if the file is unrecoverable, then the file or folder might be located on a partition or drive where the user does not have access.
