Pushing the envelope: Lessons learned from building Firefox for Android - nikod ===== jawnee My first go at fixing legacy code back in 1997. My condolences. I think the most important thing we learned was to _not_ do it. Most people here have been doing it for as long as they've been doing software. That's what we keep missing. Stop. Stop, and think about the things you've done. Stop and take a look around you. What do you see? Have you used most of these tools you have? Most software engineers I know have not and will never use most of the tool you have. They refuse to use it because they feel that is abstracting them away from the actual problem they are trying to solve. We build too much, and we test too little. We assume we know the problem space so we build the tool to tackle it. It's like throwing another wrench into the chain. We try to solve the problem but end up creating a whole new problem. We've seen it before and it's time to learn from history. The thing I've learned from being a software engineer for so long is that a lot of the time we _don't_ know the problem. It's a guessing game that's pretty hard to get good at. We throw tools at it that never really try to ask if the tool is even the right tool to solve the problem. Sooner or later we'll have to throw out the tool and be faced with the questions of the need for the new tool. It's a cycle that will have to
