Debt collector threatens to arrest debtors A debt collector has threatened to arrest a man who owes $10,500 in state and federal income taxes if he didn't pay the money to a collection agency. But a U.S. Magistrate Judge has ordered the man freed until further hearing because the collector's alleged threats have no basis in law. The Magistrate, whose name is being withheld because he hasn't yet decided the case, did issue a temporary order of release to a man who owes $10,500 in state and federal income taxes. But in response to the order, the collector, Robert A. Eskew, called a number for the man, listed a $4,000 bank loan with the collector as a second mortgage on the man's home and told him he would be arrested if the money was not paid, court papers allege.

Eskew also called the man's employer and suggested that the man owed money and threatened to have him arrested if the company didn't pay him, the papers allege. According to court papers, the tax debt stems from the man's sales tax account for the period 1984-1986 and 1987-1990. He reported sales of $57,254 for the period 1984-1990, court papers allege. But some of his creditors and the state Division of Taxation both disagreed with the amount of the tax he owed, court papers say. The man is seeking an order of permanent injunction against the collection agency that employs Eskew. The man's lawyer has argued in court papers that his client owes only about $2,000 in unpaid taxes. But the collection agency has not produced any documentary evidence that supports its claim, the papers say. The agency's claim of $10,500 is a "guess," made without supporting documentation. The man's lawyer argued that the
