Q: How to integrate django with existing non-django framework using server side templating? I'm a bit of newbie with the the python world and would like to know what is the best way to integrate django with my existing web app. I have a Django powered CMS with lots of pluggable modules that return data from the database. I'm currently generating the HTML using C# server-side and just running the Django template engine on them. I've never really developed a web app with that before (generating all HTML on the server side). I'm wondering if it is possible to use a server side templating framework like Textile and have django used to integrate all the pluggable modules I created? A: I would think twice about using django in such a configuration. What you described is almost exactly what django is for: integrating an existing framework. There are many existing frameworks out there, use something else. It may be possible to use django as a way to integrate some pluggable modules, but you're going to have a hell of a time integrating everything you have with a framework that is already integrated into most web frameworks. Maybe use something like Zope instead of django. If you are applying by the OERI EC, please send your electronic copy of your application to Trish@oerielab.org.
